Research and specialist programme work inform us that men who commit domestic violence often contact specialist services because they have either been told to, their partner has left them or because of child contact issues. Therefore ending their use of domestic violence may not be a priority. Some men choose to feel bitter about attending a programme and some men will choose to quit.

Programme facilitators assist men to increase their motivation to end their domestic violence and guide them on their journey of change. This road map shows the possible routes men might choose to take. Everyone knows which is the best option.

Some men complete the journey for respectful values, better beliefs and loving behaviour, becoming safe and fun to live with.
